WILL HELP TO PASS SHIP PURCHASE BILL

Progressive Republicans Tell President Two Changes Will Win Support.

Provided the President consents to two changes in the text, leading progres sive Republicans may come to the rescue of the Administration's ship pur chase bill in the Senate. Suggestions to this effect were laid before the President today by Senator Kenyon, of lowal. Should he consent to the changes, the President was told, he might count on the favorable votes of Senators La Follette, Kenyon, Clapp of Minnesota, and Norris of Nebraska, and probably Cummins of Iowa, and one or two others. Senators Kenyons and La Follette have made it plain that the progressive Republicans of the Senate have no objection to the fundamental purposes of the bill to provide Government-owned ships for American foreign trade. They have told the President that they would go even further by providing that, instead of turning over the ships to dent today by Senator Kenyon, of lown instead of turning over the ships to privae capital sventually, the Govern-ment ownership should be permanent. This is one of the changes they are They believe that the organization of the Government-owned steamship lines should be placed in charge of a non partisan commission, instead of Cabine partisan commission, instead of Cabinet officers.

Neither Senator would indicate the President's position, but it is apparent that he is prepared to make concessions. The Administration has practically abandoned every other feature of the legislative program with the exception, perhaps, of the conservation bills.

There are strong indications that the President is disturbed. He is said to feel that members of the Senate have permitted questions of patronage to weigh against matters of vital moment to the nation.

The Senators, on the other hand, have reforted that the patronage row is of the President's own making. Some of the leading Democrats of the Senate, among them Senators Stone, Thomas, and Johnson, are letting the President know that they will insist upon due deference to Democratic Senators in patronage matters.

Failure of the ship purchase bill will bring an extra session, it is believed.

PHOTOPLAYS AND PHOTOPLA YERS

Picture Plays Made From Famous Books Should Tell the Book's Story.

Some days ago attention was called to the manner in which the story of "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" had been made into a photoplay with a rather severe condemnation of the method. One or two of our readers who saw the play but were not familiar with the book or the stage production took us to task for our comment. From their point of view, they were absolutely right to do so. Our comment was based upon a reading of the book and a view of the original stage production. And the name of the production. And the name of the production was given it for the purpose of attracting attention of just such people as we are—that is the only excuse for it. The comment—very just comment, let us repeat—of our friends regarding the severity of our comment raises a new point in the consideration of motion picture places. motion picture plays. We have noticed it several times, but have refrained from mentioning it here-

There, have been several big plays or books utilized for motion picture exploitation, the photoplay being nothing at all like either the book exploitation, the photoplay being nothing at all like either the book or the stage production. The only thing it had that was anything like the thing it was supposed to be was the title, and the names of the characters. Now, the title had a meaning only for people who had read the book or seen the stage play. Such persons could not fail to associate the title and the names of the characters with the book or the play they had read on seen, and when the photoplay had nothing in common with either they would naturally be disappointed and condemn it, just as we did "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch." Our friends tell ushose friends who know not the book and play in question—that the photoplay was a very pleasing melodrama. We believe it was—now that we come to think of it. But it was NOT "Mrs. Wiggs" as we know her by any process of reasoning, and, therefore the showing of it under that name was bad business on the part of the producer. Any other name would have attracted people who did not know her just as well. It seems to us that photoplaywrights and producers should take them into consideration when they make their plays and produce them. They would help their own business more by sticking closely to the text they pretend to stick business more by sticking closely to the text they pretend to stick to by their titles—or leave them

To by their titles—or leave them alone altogether.

The whole business of photoplay-wrighting is undergoing a very bigchange. Louis Reeves Harrison devotes considerable space to the subject in the latest edition of the Moving Picture World. Among other things he says:

"Moving pictures seem to be in a state of transition from the murder.

"Moving pictures seem to be in a state of transition from the murder-and-mush of amsteurs to stories which express some resultant of human experience worthy of attention. Eyery author who has made a study of audiences knows that they respond quickly to a presentation which makes a clear and direct appeal to intelligence. That rect appeal to intelligence. That intelligence may vary among individual units, but the concentration enforced by screen presentation puts the aggregate mind in a receptive condition, a state in which there is very little to distract attention, or distort indigence, and constitute of distract attention, and constitute of distract attention, and constitute of distract attention, and constitute of distract attention. tion or distort judgment, and commonsense about pictures is as universal as love of music—only those who lack it can tolerate discords.

who lack it can tolerate discords. "Comedy, even of the farcical kind, is in large demand because of wearisome repetition in serious plays from which only authors of originality can deliver us and of discordance in others from which only authors capable of solving deep and ever-widening problems can give up freedom. Writers who have studied our social impotence, our political corruption, the widespread distrust of laws and conventional morality, and kindred problems can find themes enough. And when the soundest of such writers give these subjects of universal interest adequate treatment we may all enjoy really high-class screen productions. really high-class screen productions, especially with full-blooded charac-ters and not wooden marionettes in
